For about the last 25 years, Mike Mann and his team of around 25 refugee hill people that he has trained have been providing fresh water on a village by village basis to stateless refugees where they live in the forests of northern Thailand. Water is provided to every home in each village and to date over 250 villages receive fresh water which is around half the villages that constitute the whole community. The water is provided from mountain streams and is transmitted by gravitational feed. The average distance to each village from their water source is five kilometres and the villagers work with the “experts” in providing the channelling of the water from its source.

To date fresh water has been provided to 60,000 people; a million gallons of water are delivered each day. The 250 installations completed over the last 25 years are all still operational. The goal is to provide water to every village.

Mike Mann lives with his wife, Becky, in Chiang Mai, where he has lived for most of his life. He is the son of missionary parents. Mike began this project around 25 years ago and he is an expert in rural development. Mike has around 25 people in his team, all of whom are from the hill tribes.

This project, linked with the micro loan scheme, has revolutionised the lives of the villagers in the mountains.
